The collision at Chicago. To the Editor of The New-York Tribuse: The terrible catastrople of the collision upon the Michigan Central Road rear Chicago, whereby many lives have been lost and many persons seriously injured, naturally excites the injury as to the cause of the accident, and who is responsible for it. The collision occurred at a place some cight or ten miles from Chicago where the Central Road crosses the track of the Michigan Southern Road. The express train of the latter Company left Chicago at the usual time, and, in the absence of any definite information on the subject, it is to be presumed that the emigrant train upon the Central Road was an irregular one, or one out of time, and that this was the immediate cause of the collision.

Why the conductors of the respective trains did not perceive each other in time to avoid the collision.

lect, it is to be presumed that the emigrant train upon the Central Read was an irregular one or one out of time, and that this was the immediate cause of the collision.

Why the conductors of the respective trains did not perceive each other in time to avoid the collision, is not yet known.

But the most important inquiry is, what right—what legal authority—had the Directors of the companies to have their trains at the place where the collision happened. At the crossing is question, the Southern Road (known there by the name of Northern Indians) Arid constructed its road, and was the shedute owner of the land where the crossing is made, and where the collision occurred.

After their Road was built at that point, the Michigan Central Company, to import the road was built at that point, the Michigan Central Company, without the consent of the Michigan Southern Company, and against their capress objection and dissent, proceeded to construct their Road over and across the Road of the Seuthern Company. Knowing that this course was unsel, and fearing the very consequence which has occurred, the Directors of the Northern Indians Company, on the 25th of April, 1852, (just one year before the accident occurred, by formal resolutions, demanded of the Central Company to pass the track of the Southern Company "by a bridge," as being the only any fe mode expedent to "be adopted," and "refused to agree to any other mode of creasing their Road except by a bridge," as being the only any fe mode expedent to "be adopted," and "refused to agree to any other mode of creasing their Road except by a bridge," as being the only any fe mode expedent to "be adopted," and "refused to agree to any other mode of creasing their Road except by a bridge to the construction as to the mode and manner of reason the same, and where as follows:
